Media Arts and Communications are global enterprises. Information travels through seemingly infinite channels and touches every corner of the earth. History and culture often dictate a nation's approach to how, when and where information is shared. Studying Abroad offers students a unique opportunity to experience these differences first-hand.

By stepping beyond the borders of the United States, students can witness and analyze the varying perspectives on media and communications, and experience the impact of more liberal approaches (as seen in Western Europe) or more conservative approaches (as seen in China). These variations are not only seen in print and broadcast news, but also in film, television, music, and more. Explore your many program options on this flyer, and talk to a Cornell Abroad advisor for more detailed program information.
